In 1873, the city of St. Joseph was rebuilding following the aftermath of the Civil War. Locally, during this time the James Brothers were riding through the country side with the Younger gang and nationally Susan B. Anthony was put on trial and fined $100 for voting in the 1872 presidential election. This was the same year that a women's Bible study was formed in St. Joseph and was comprised of members of various Protestant churches in the area.

Eager to put their faith into action, the group began to provide assistance to the unfortunate. Thus, the Ladies Union Benevolent Association, LUBA, was formed.

By 1874, LUBA, through the soliciting and contributions made by tea sales, rented a small frame house which they named the "Home of the Friendless" to house the less fortunate. The very first day, they took in a woman and her two children, caring for sixteen people by months end. However, the home's first few years proved to be difficult by the constant pressure by those within their neighborhood urging the home to relocate. It was not until 1880 that LUBA established its first permanent residence on the corner of Main and Poulin with the financial support of local business men.

Over the next 20 years the home grew. In 1894, a local businessman and his wife, Charles and Serepta Noyes, took it upon themselves to purchase land and to build a home to house the ever-increasing number of children that LUBA had been caring for. Originally called "The Home for Little Wanderers," the facility would become recognized throughout the community as "The Noyes Home for Children" in honor of Charles and Serepta Noyes' generosity.

From that first day in 1894 - when thirty-nine children arrived at the home - to today, "The Noyes Home" has kept its doors open to those in need throughout the region. Nearly 200 children pass through the doors each year in need of a safe environment to call home. Continually upholding the original mission to "nurture and empower children, youth, and families to foster and brighten futures," LUBA has continued to provide the same sense of security, love, and care to the less fortunate of our community for the last 120 years.
